

activity on the Cyprus issue. I was pleased that on July 17-18, U.S. Ambassador to the UN Madeleine Albright and Special Envoy Richard Beattie traveled to the region with specific recommendations for easing tension in the buffer zone and in an effort to improve the atmosphere for advancing a negotiated settlement.

Unfortunately, one of the positive results of this visit, a proposed meeting between the commanders of the Greek Cypriot forces and of the Turkish forces on the island—which would have been the first such meeting since the occupation of northern Cyprus in 1974—did not take place as hoped, due to differences over whether representatives of Turkish Cypriot forces would be present.

Although the trip did not result in any significant break-throughs, it was viewed in the Administration and the region as an important step in diffusing tension, in dealing with security and military issues and, hopefully, in creating a suitable environment to start a more substantive U.S. initiative later this year.

THE U.S. ROLE IS CRITICAL

The recent violence in Cyprus underscores my long-held view that progress on Cyprus is long overdue and should be a high U.S. priority. It remains my hope that a fair and lasting settlement of the Cyprus dispute can be reached in the coming months.

It has always been my firm belief that only high-level and sustained U.S. attention will convince all parties and particularly the Turks, to resolve the Cyprus issue.

It is in U.S. interest as well as all the people of the region that we find a just and lasting solution to this problem.

Turkey remains the key to progress on Cyprus. Only Turkey can push Turkish-Cypriot leader Denktash toward a settlement.

Now is the time to push a U.S. initiative forward. I urge the Administration and specifically Ambassador Beattie, the President's special envoy on Cyprus, to reactivate his diplomacy so that further violence can be averted.

MACEDONIA

Improved relations between Greece and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, FYROM, are critical to greater stability in the southern Balkans.

The U.S. has been more sensitive than any of Greece's other allies to Greek concerns regarding FYROM. This Administration has sought to balance its desire to respect Greek concerns with the need to address the new realities created by the dissolution of the former Yugoslavia.

I have consistently urged the Administration to link recognition and the establishment of diplomatic relations with FYROM to a series of steps by the Skopje government to reassure the legitimate security concerns of Greece.

Now this policy is succeeding. Last fall, the Foreign Ministers of Greece and FYROM finalized an agreement which separated the intractable name issue from the other issues. Under the agreement FYROM agreed to change its flag and amend its constitution, and Greece agreed to end its economic blockade of FYROM—which was hurting Greece as well.

This historic agreement was brokered by two Americans, former Secretary of State Cyrus Vance on behalf of the UN and special U.S. envoy Matthew Nimetz.

Face-to-face talks at the UN have so far been unable to produce an agreement on the official name for FYROM. It seems that the FYROM authorities have been unwilling to compromise on this key issue.

I am hopeful that the agreement between Greece FYROM will move us from an era of confrontation and instability to one which will prove mutually advantageous to the people of both Greece and FYROM.

The United States and its NATO allies want to continue to assist Greece and FYROM—within the framework of the UN-sponsored negotiations—to work out their remaining mutual problems, particularly the name issue, as soon as possible.

The failed assassination attempt on FYROM President Gligorov last year, as well as the continuing unrest among the ethnic Albanian population, vividly demonstrates the fragile stability in FYROM, and the need for regional stability.

CONCLUSION

I would like to conclude by reaffirming the special relationship that exists between the United States and Greece. This relationship is based on our long history of shared values and our common interests in stability in southern Europe.

Stability in Greece stands in stark contrast to the unsettled situation in Turkey and the rest of the Balkans. We must continue to engage with Turkey, as a critical NATO ally on a whole range of issues.

But until Turkey can resolve key issues—particularly finding some sort of political solution in southeastern Turkey and ending the division of Cyprus—the U.S. and Greece will find their efforts to achieve lasting stability in southeastern Europe thwarted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. JAN MEYERS

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1996

Mrs. MEYERS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, last week, on two occasions, I was recorded as not voting on measures at a time when I was on the House floor and did insert my voting card.

On Tuesday, September 17, I voted "yes" on rollcall 415, a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill conferring honorary citizenship on Mother Teresa.

On Thursday, September 19, I was on the floor when rollcall vote No. 422 was called, and I voted "yes" on the majority leader's motion to table the Linder privileged resolution.

I am uncertain why these votes did not register, but I was present and voting in both instances.

THE IMPACT OF THE IRISH POTATO FAMINE ON AMERICAN HISTORY

HON. RODNEY P. FRELINGHUYSEN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1996

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Speaker, today, I introduced legislation along with Representative MENENDEZ to encourage America's schools to teach our young students about a tragic period in history that nearly destroyed the people and country of Ireland and forever changed the face of America.

The mass starvation in Ireland from 1845 to 1850 initiated by the dramatic failure of the Irish potato crop is most commonly referred to as the Irish Potato Famine. Although Europe's poorest country in the middle 19th century, Ireland's 8 million inhabitants were curiously well-nourished. The Irish people relied on the potato for the bulk of their diet since it was inexpensive and high in nutrients. However, in 1845, the Irish potato crop was ruined across the entire countryside by phytophthora infestans, an airborne petilence. At the time, no one knew what caused the potato blight and so little could be done to save the crops. Across the whole of Ireland, potatoes simply rotted on the ground.

The failure of the potato crop led to the inability of most Irish families to pay the rent on their cottages which, after Britain's annexation of the island in the late 18th century, were often owned by British landholders. The vicious cycle of poverty was held intact by both the continuation of the potato blight and the active exportation of the Irish grain crop by the British Crown. Those who traveled across the island during the famine noted the horrifying situation in which they encountered the Irish people. Men, women, and children literally starved to death on the roadside and families huddled together in the cold waiting to die. In fact, while visiting Ireland in 1845, the African-American abolitionist Frederick Douglass wrote that the people of Ireland "are in the same degradation as the American slaves."

A number of British groups threw aside the prevailing prejudices against the Irish to provide relief from what had become a starvation of epidemic proportions in the colony. The Quakers, or the Society of Friends, even set up a vast array of soup kitchens throughout the countryside. However, it was not enough to stop the hunger and loss of farming wages. By the end of the epidemic in 1850, more than 1 million Irish had perished from the hunger, cold, and disease brought about by the potato blight. It seemed the only way to elude the horrors of the famine was to leave Ireland—and so many did just that:

Although the voyage was treacherous and relatively expensive, more than 1 million Irish emigrated to the United States during the famine. Initially, they settled in the cities of the northeastern seaboard such as Boston and New York. Later they pushed westward to Chicago, the Great Plains, and the uncharted Western territories. With them they brought their Celtic culture and determination. Aside from impacting the basic makeup of the American people, Irish-Americans have made significant contributions in American business, law, music, athletics, literature, religion, and politics. In fact, U.S. Presidents John F. Kennedy and Ronald Reagan, considered by many to be the greatest Presidential orators in their respective political parties this century, are both from Irish-American families.

Perhaps, though, the legacy of the Irish Famine's immigration wave to America is most evident in our everyday lives. Today, 5 million of New Jersey's 8 million inhabitants claim some Irish descent, as do millions of other Americans. The resolution put forth today by myself and Representative MEMENDEZ recognizes the contributions made by Irish-Americans to our greater American heritage. Irish-Americans have left an indelible mark on American culture and history, and for that reason our children should learn more about the tragic famine which brought so many of them to our shores in search of freedom from hunger, freedom from want, and freedom from colonial rule.
